

GLENDALE DAIRY BUILDING
Common Name: Dentist Offices
608 Polk St. (Corner Polk and Clay St.)
O.T. Blk 135 Lots 5 & 7

Built: 1956
Glendale Dairy

The original house on the lot was built by John H. Bartlett after selling his first family home next door.

1888: James Seavey purchased the lots and house and was the occupant during the uptown fire in June of 1900. It was one of only three remaining structures on the block after the fire. Seavey passed it on to his daughter, Leila Seavey Bartlett, who remained in the home for many years. The house was finally left vacant and went into a decline. It was later torn down.

1947: William Berg sold the lots to Louis Schultz, who in turn resold them in November of 1956. The Angeles Co-op Creamery (also known as the Glendale Dairy at this time) constructed, and operated from, the current building.

1985: Quimper Credit Union (also a co-operative) remodeled and took over the site.

1991-2008: Dr. Larry D. Little, D.M.D, remodeled once more and the building is still being used as a dentist office.
